PUBLIC FOUNTAINS.

There is one noble feature of public improvements to which we have hitherto paid little or no attention, but which as much as any other adds beauty and dignity to the aspect of a great city,—we mean the frequent appearance of public fountains. By this we do not mean to place the location of wooden troughs here and there, for the use of thirsty horses; nor a common hydrant, with chained tin dipper, left running at long intervals at our dusty street corners. These are very useful contrivances, to be sure, as far as they go, but give neither elegance nor beauty to a city. What we allude to are such sculptured gems of art, in stone or bronze, as are to be found scattered at random among the streets and squares of all the cities of Continental Europe; beautiful objects that arrest the attention of the artistic traveller wherever he moves, in Germany, France, Belgium, or Italy.

Without speaking of that queen of modern cities—poor beleaguered Paris—there is surely a town in France, of any pretension whatever, without several fine fountains. Rome is literally crowded with these pleasing and refreshing objects. Turn where you will, you have but a little way to go before you come upon some "Fonte della Napoli"—something or other; some rich device of well-carved figures in groups, pouring water in every direction. Water is playing and bubbling everywhere; now emerging from huge basins placed in the centre of some spacious square, now rushing and foaming like a torrent to the solid flank of some building, in the very centre of the city, among sea-horses and Tritons spouting water from their shells. And this not for any grand holiday exhibition, like the sumptuous water displays at Versailles, but for every day and constant enjoyment. German cities, too, are famous for these public objects of usefulness and decoration. One at Augsburg is particularly remarkable. Around a richly-carved octagonal structure, rising out of a large basin and surrounded by a colossal bronze group of Hercules slaying the Hydra, are seated exquisite female figures in bronze, of life-size, in most graceful attitudes. One is squeezing her long tresses, another pressing her breast from which flows the limpid fluid, while, at the base, among mermaids squirting water from their lips, are a number of merry little arching straining geese, from whose upturned beaks the streams of water spout up and cross each other in every direction. These figures are all of costly bronze; there is not one of them but, as a work of art, is fit to grace any Gallery in Christendom, and yet there they are, not for any private show, but as a common street ornament! We really think travellers are more impressed by the fountains in those German cities and elsewhere than, perhaps, by any other single feature in their rich treasures of art; for it is high art applied in a direction to which we are here so totally unacquainted.

And why should this be so? In every department of art we are making such rapid headway that New York bids fair to become, in another decade or two, one of the most beautiful capitals in the world. We have a supply of water in unusual abundance, and our natural draining facilities are unsurpassed. There is no city in the world more capable of adornment in this direction, if we only applied the proper taste and energy to it. Even the Central Park, beautiful as it is in every respect, as far as it has gone, and carrying evidences, as it does, of more concentrated and uniform taste in all its details than perhaps any other park in existence, is still far behind with its fountains. But it is not so much the united effort upon one such grand work as would be here applicable to which we now especially allude; it is rather to such fountains as would be fit to be placed in any of the prominent locations still left us as breathing places: for instance, in City Hall Square, in front of the new Post Office; in Union Square, Madison Square, in all the spaces left at the grand junctions where Broadway cuts diagonally across the avenues. If this be luxury beyond the reach of our municipal authorities, surely we have individual wealth among us far surpassing that to be found in most European cities, and to which the latter are able to directly trace much of their public adornments. To what better purpose could one of our many millionaires devote a portion of his surplus wealth than by presenting his city with a splendid work of art, in the shape of a public fountain? But Cincinnati has already taken the start of us in this respect, and what we have here only shown out as a suggestion has already been realized by one of her wealthiest citizens, Mr. Probasco—whose sumptuous residence in the environs of Cincinnati, and rare treasures of art from all parts of the world are worthy of a long pilgrimage to visit—has presented his native city with a most costly and magnificent fountain, to be set up in Fifth street market place: a work of art which, in size, richness, and beauty of design and execution will, when complete, place it in favorable comparison with anything of the kind to be found in Europe. The whole was designed and executed at Munich, Bavaria, by the first of living sculptors in bronze, and must be now nearly ready to put in place. The various groups and figures, which are all of bronze life-size, are exquisite and appropriate works of art, and the whole is surmounted by one majestic female figure, with wide-spread arms, scattering water showers from the palms of her hands. The whole thing is designed upon the grandest scale imaginable. We regret that we have not at hand the particulars of this glorious work, of which we only had a hurried glimpse by the model, and may revert to it at some future time.
